

HIS LATEST BOOK

Brilliant Stories by William Allen White.

Their Motives of Politics and Love.

Kansas, if she were geographically as she is topographically, would be inviolated, and as carved as an interrogation mark. The Kansas is born with a question on his lips.

The people of Wichita who read books, all Kansas who read books, are now luxuriating in the latest volume from the pen of William Allen White, entitled "Stratagems and Spolia." It consists of five stories of political motifs with an intricate accompaniment of love.

People in New England, in the central states and in the south who are reading these stories are asking no questions. In Kansas the question among all the book-readers is: "Are they true? Did they happen?" and the eternal Kansas suspicion, "Who's he hitting?"

And in two queries there is a world of commendation for the stories, in the questions the very best, the fairest and the most substantial compliment.

It is a great feat to make the prairie-born see a prairie landscape, to charm him from the pastures of life to the art in it. It is a greater feat to take the personality that has become commonplace by long familiarity, and without violation of the environment, attach to it an absorbing romantic interest.

White's men and women of ink and paper are not photographs. They are oil. The political man whom one reads will mistake for John, and another for Brown, is neither, and he is both. He has Brown's ear, and a new mouth. Senator Wharton never existed and yet he did exist. Dan Gregg is not biographical. He is as much a fiction as one of Turner's trees with a plant of green in place of the impossible reproduction of every individual leaf.

Now White has done his best in this: having pitched his Kansas reader into watching the sky-line with out a subconscious effort to compute the accurate il-tervening, and having invented the scene with personalities that are strangely familiar and yet palpably fictional, he has deftly shifted incident and passion to gather until the mechanism of the thing has vanished, the clock and chime of the kitescope have disappeared, and his men and women breathe, walk, laugh, live and with that peculiarly vital tenacity which makes the best of pen-created beings more enduring than real men and women, as Mowbray outlasts all who furnished Dickens the type, as Shakespeare's Caesar outlives the historical Caesar.

It is a pleasant thing for a Kansas author to gain New England applause with a Kansas story; it is a greater thing for a Kansas author to gain Kansas applause with a Kansas story.

So when the Kansas, fearful that at the time he may have missed something in the dispatches or the newspaper correspondents didn't tell all they knew of a political situation, asks if White's stories "really happened," he is giving the highest commendation a writer of fiction can receive.

How many Kansas will respond to this touch from the author, in a description of a Congressman, defeated for re-election, returning to the Kansas town at night, how familiar the misty "bus and the faded circle in the dark."

One rainy night, late in the spring Henry Myton came home to Pleasant Ridge. The light in the great Colorado express train, reflecting from a thousand pools in the road, and the dim, smoky lamp in the town square, were the only pyrotechnics that greeted him. The trunk crashed upon the rickety baggage-truck, the conductor waved the signal and in the twinkling of an eye the impatient plowing dragon had wormed his way to the left in the swirling bill of air, was taking in the distance and the rain and the dark and the pungent spring wind were left to frolic over the village. Henry Myton climbed into the misty "bus and listened to the splashing of the horses in the slough roads. No street lamp marked their way and to Myton it seemed that the vehicle was circling round and round. Just before he gave up to acknowledge the fog, scurrying sound of a cramped wheel and the jerking movement of the running gear told Myton that he was near his journey's end.

He hurried across the sidewalk into the office of the hotel. It was a plain room. A high counter ran parallel to one wall. On the counter was a tarnished brass case and a discolored register. Opposite the counter stood an ink-stained desk, surrounded by a rusty business directory ten years out of date. Near by was a long sink that held a water-bucket, and an earthen wash-bowl over which hung two towels. There was a chattering machine, a typewriter, some paint, medicine, prints, and a big handbell announcing a public sale, were the mural decorations of the room. However, there had been a time when these walls seemed palatial to Henry Myton. Ten years before that rainy spring night, he had owned the first five hundred dollar clock after winning the Nerlie Gordon number case. He never came back to the Anne house, Pleasant Ridge, without adding at the recollection of the vain figure he cut there, looking upon his clock, with his bank against the high ceiling, puffing a tea-pot cigar, wearing his eye-glasses, and talking up the famous victory. Triumphs—major triumphs had come to Myton in that room. In the corner by the window, he made the combination that brought him the nomination to the state senate. That discolored register contained the names of the committeemen who notified him of his second congressional nomination.

And then "It was early that spring morning after his return from Washington when Myton awoke in his old bed in a single wagon track had been cut in the muddy main street in front of his window. Yet the sound of the weak-pounding in the kitchen below announced that the business day in Pleasant Ridge was about to begin. He whistled with some show of gaiety as he dressed. Frequently he looked up and down the squat little street, with its sprawling buildings and their dirty wooden awnings. He could see the prairie birds in wait on the hill and the creek crouching below—each checking the growth of the unpainted little thoroughfare.

Here are some expressions of White's characters, the morally good, bad and indifferent men and women of his creation, picked at random through the volume:

"To me it is as inevitable as the fact of the sun rising as the fact of the sun rising, the impractical fellow in politics is to be reckoned with."

A political boss is a hypnotist. He holds his power by a constant repetition, in a thousand ways, of the declaration that his power exists. Every denial of this direct suggestion weakens his influence.

"Honesty in politics is generally considered a luxury for a poor man."

"Desire to win puts a callous on a man that numbs him like the chill of death."

"He felt a blind desire, the indefinable yearning for something strong outside himself—the yearning that older men and women feel when they call on God."

"He had learned long since that the higher the stakes the more likelihood he had of winning."

"He begged that comfort with drunken affection."

"When the world turns upside down, many strange things come to the top."

"She was tall with the weight that comes to those who like their beef steak rare, and their game a trifle high, with lines of character, not of worry, in her face, with an easily balanced laugh that often brought out a double chin."

"It was enthusiasm that makes things move in the world."

"The speech could not be reported any more than the gravitation of a serpent charming a bird may be put into words."

"The men who seem to be leading mobs are really led by mobs; are taken off their feet by waves of impulse and suggestion, so that mob-leaders are really as treacherable as the mob."

"Living an entirely emotional life with god, and he puts all sorts of warning signs at the mill posts of the years in men's lives. At the sixtieth mile post there is a danger sign which warns men against new enterprises."

"His location among his fellows smote him when he saw that he was afraid to advise with his banker and ashamed to talk with his lawyer."

"He had learned long since that the higher the stakes the more likelihood he had of winning."

any world have thought of such a thing?"

The day following all the fashionable were similar overcoats and behind the invention of the paletot, which, like the stricker, has made the tour of the world.

Hand-shaking on a level with the shoulder, came into fashion through the present Queen, then Princess of Wales, giving her hand at that angle to her guests at a garden party at Marlborough house.

Her Royal Highness happened to have an alcove under the right arm at the time, and could not, therefore shake hands on a level with her shoulder.

According to the same writer, Count D'Orsay was referring from a steep decline when he was caught in a storm. Looking around him he observed a sailor wrapped up in a loose overcoat of coarse cloth, reaching to his knees. "Will you sell your great coat?" said the count, after tapping the sailor into the public house by the offer of a drink. "Willingly, my lord," answered the sailor, pocketing the ten guineas offered him for a garment not worth one. The count put it on and stole into London. The storm had blown over, and he joined the riders in the Park.
